A Martian is being touted as the perfect expression of the digital age, as the President was presented with the peace prize at a ceremony in Oslo, Norway. "We can touch and communicate with everything in the solar system from a simple website," said President Obama, according to the official Norwegian news agency. The President acknowledged the two Nobel committees - the Norwegian and the Swedish - for their contribution to the peace prize, and said the decision had given him "an opportunity to fulfill the vision of my dear grandmother". "We have entered a new era. We are the first generation on the cusp of the space age. An age where humans have developed the technology to move beyond the moon and explore the universe." It was a more upbeat recognition than the one-year-old Fannie Lou Hamer, who in 1976 accepted the prize for her leadership of the Mississippi Freedom Party. Nastya Shevchenko, the Ukrainian woman who was pardoned in 1999 for her role in staging an uprising against the Soviet regime, also reflected on the sudden rise of America as a leader in space exploration. The event is being watched with interest by scientists and political leaders from around the world. But even as Nasa announced details of the ambitious mission to Mars, it emerged that Nasa was facing continued problems in its plan for a manned space flight to the moon. Air Force leaders said the US is now planning to carry out a test launch of its new $18bn Ares rocket as early as the summer of 2010.
