Technical Field This invention relates to field of flight simulation, and more particularly to mobile, low-power, broadband wireless communications for flight simulation using augmented reality headsets. 2. Description of the Prior Art Virtual Reality headsets have been used in flight simulators for a number of years. They provide a realistic visual experience for aviators and aircraft pilots. A virtual reality simulator may be used to train pilots in extreme situations in which it would be dangerous to fly an actual aircraft. Virtual reality headsets are generally infrared systems, which use infrared light to convey images to the user's eyes. Because the human retina is not sensitive to infrared light, the infrared light may be mixed with visible light to create an image which appears to be a natural world to the pilot. The infrared systems have several drawbacks. The infrared light itself may cause headaches and other physiological problems, as in space. The infrared system is also sensitive to the sun. When flying at night, the pilot must keep his or her head and eyes pointed at the stars in order to see through the infrared system. In the daytime, the infrared systems may be less effective, and this may mean a failure to perceive obstacles. Infrared images are also less clear and sharper than images based on visible light. Before releasing a new generation of aircraft, pilots often train on older planes, known as taxi training. The IRS headsets are not used in taxis, but it is desirable to have the IRS headsets available for use in virtual taxi
