Hp Photo Printing Software Version 2.6.2.5.Q: RESTful API security best practices for user registration I'm currently looking at how to go about developing a RESTful API in java which is to be consumed by a mobile application. I believe I have the general idea down of how to develop a RESTful API but am a little lost as to what to put in place of authentication. Currently I have an initial screen where the user can register or login to the application. The basic requirement for this app is that the mobile app must be able to handle multiple users in the system. The initial screen looks something like this: I know that this is a basic form of authentication but it is required in order for the mobile application to continue. Upon input of username and password a user is created in the database. If the information is incorrect the form is refreshed and the user is taken back to the form. I don't know if a session based token is a correct method for authenticating but I would like to avoid it if possible. If a session token is not possible what would be the best way of handling authentication for the RESTful API? A: For authentication in RESTful API, you need to use HTTP basic authentication. In this case, if you use HTTP basic authentication, you have to send username and password to the server in the request headers. Then, in the server you have to verify the user through a login. And also,
