update. The fallout from two major decisions this week has moved forward yet again. The Senate Intelligence Committee released its report on CIA torture on Thursday, declaring that under the Bush Administration's leadership, torture was "immoral,"
"illegal," and "tantamount to torture." On Friday, the Obama administration upheld its ban on military tribunals for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, and also assured the Supreme Court that detainees held in the U.S. cannot be transferred outside the country for fear of torture. Not surprisingly, Thursday's Senate report has drawn some criticism. Jesselyn Radack, a U.S. government employee who worked for the Justice Department as a translator for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, wrote on her own blog on Friday that the report showed that “We were lied to, mistreated and abused.” She added, “And by our government. And by the same people who consider us unpatriotic if we don’t follow the leader.” Unfortunately, the Senate report did much more than simply speak to the legality of the torture program. It has a lot to say about how the practice of torture became the norm in the CIA. After all, the CIA wasn’t the only institution that was party to the practice. The White House had its own torture program, albeit one that was somewhat less coercive. And the CIA didn’t begin its torture program alone: In October 2002, the
